SOC 3400: Medical Sociology

This course explores the social dimensions of health, disease and illness, focusing especially on the social experience of illness, the social determinants of disease, and the role and meaning of medicine and public health in modern U.S. society. The class examines how we define health problems and their solutions, and it considers the ways in which race, gender, class, and social connections matter for understanding health-related experiences and discourses.

Credits: 3
Program: Sociology